After Skinner sees the utter joy of the head bookkeeper in the office, who has just become a proud father, he realizes that he is missing life's greatest pleasure. This realization deepens on his way home that evening as he sees other people joyously fondling their babies, and even an old hen happily clucking to her young. He talks the matter over with Honey. Some time later the adoring little Honey confides her great secret to her wonderful boy, who goes into an ecstasy of delight. Immediately they begin elaborate plans for him, for of course it will be a boy. The day of the great event, Skinner gets first news of the little stranger's arrival via telephone and proudly announces the arrival of William Manning Skinner, Jr., to the office. Everybody rushes out to buy presents and gets to the house as quickly as the new father himself, with toy guns, hobby horses and everything else a baby boy could wish. Alas, though, it is a baby girl. But Honey and Skinner happily decide that a girl should be the first born, anyway.
